

YORK V. YALE:
ONE MAKES A MONOPOLY,
TWO MAKES A MARKET

The Ph.D. program in law at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School now has some serious competition, what with the Yale Law School getting into this line of business. Reasonable minds might differ about which program is better, but not about which price is better. In the York program students pay about $6,000 per year, which sounds like a bargain until it's compared to Yale's program, in which students are paid about $27,000 per year. Compare Tuition & Fees, www.osgoode.yorku.ca/programs/graduate-studies/program-details/tuition-fees (York), with Tuition & Financial Aid, www.law.yale.edu/graduate/phd_tuition.htm (Yale); but see Funding, www.osgoode.yorku.ca/programs/graduate-studies/program-details/funding (outlining financial aid and assistantship policies at York).

THE GREEN BAG'S CUMULATIVE CONFSSIONAL,
VOLUMES 1-15

We think our authors and readers will appreciate a convenient resource for updating works that have appeared in old issues of the Green Bag. Updating them, that is, with (1) corrections of errors to which we have confessed and (2) comments by others that we have published. We have surely made more mistakes and inspired more outrage over the past 15 years than the few we have been able (we are always willing) to record in our pages, but even those few seem like a lot when they are all scraped together in one place. So, here is the whole lot – unless we've erred in our compilation, of course, which seems fairly likely given our track record. Note that some issues of the Green Bag are not listed. Those are the ones that remain unimproved, so far.

We plan to publish something along these lines from time to time, and to add the Green Bag's siblings (the Almanac & Reader, the Journal of Law, our websites, and so on) in future editions. We can only hope the tables do not get overlarge over the long haul.
